We were recently very lucky to attend a conference at Sheridan College called the Generation Green Conference. This conference was organized by Alana Wong and a party of volunteers. Overall, the event was amazing, the workshops were proven to be very resourceful and we learned plenty. The event was extremely inspiring and included many different ways you could make an impact and help the environmental crisis. We received lots of guidance and support for our action projects and we learned numerous things like how to get started on your action project, how to track and measure your project and many wonderful opportunities to attend other events. We will be going back to this conference in the spring where we will learn how much of an impact we've made. The guest speakers motivated us to make a change. There was a very interesting Q&A with professors and specialists on the matter of climate change with the chief of an indigenous tribe. We thoroughly enjoyed this event and gained a lot of knowledge from it.
